THE LIFE OF ARTHUR ASHE

Arthur Ashe was born in Richmond, VA to Arthur Ashe Sr. & Mattie Cordell Cunningham Ashe in 1943. He had one brother who was 5 years younger. Ashe's mother died in 1950 due to complications related to pre-eclampsia (known at the time as toxemic pregnancy). Arthur and Johnnie were raised by their father who worked as the salaried caretaker for Richmond's municipal recreating department.

Forbidden by his father from playing American football, due to his slight build, Arthur became interested in tennis at the age of 7. Coaches noted his natural talent for the sport, and nurtured his skills. However, in the segregated Richmond of 1960, he was not permitted from competing against white youths in the city. Further, he was not allowed to use the city's indoor tennis courts, as these had been closed to black players. In order to continue advancing in his abilities, he accepted an invitation to move to St. Louis, where he could compete more freely.

Following High school, Ashe studied business administration at University of California at Los Angeles. An ROTC member, Ashe joined the United States Army following graduation, where he was commissioned as a Second Lieutenant. He was assigned to the United States Military Academy at West Point, where he headed the tennis program. He was promoted to First Lieutenant in 1968 and discharged in 1969.

Ashe became the first black player accepted to the United States Davis Cup team in 1963. He reached a national ranking of the third best player in the country in 1965, the year he won the NCAA single title as well as the doubles title, helping UCLA win the national championship. The Davis Cup team would retain the title in 1969. This was also the first year that he applied for a visa to South Africa to compete in the South African open. His application was denied, with the South African Government citing their strict apartheid regime. South Africa continued to deny his applications for years, and Ashe pursued both US sanctions and the expulsion of South Africa from the International Lawn Tennis Federation.

Facing a ban from the Olympics and increasing isolation from the international community, South Africa granted Ashe's visa application for the first time in 1973, opening the way for Ashe to compete in the South African Open. Though he lost the singles final to Jimmy Connors, he won the doubles competition. Despite the boycotts, Ashe felt his presence might help break down stereotypes and, through winning, he could serve as an example of the positive outcomes of integration. He lost to Connors again in 1974. He admitted in 1977 that he had been wrong to compete in South Africa, and renewed his support for a boycott of South African players. The precipitating incident came when he went to purchase some tickets for some young Africans and was instructed to use a segregated counter. Ashe also called for South Africa to be expelled from the professional tennis circuit and Davis Cup.

Despite his fitness as an athlete, Arthur Ashe suffered a heart attack while teaching a tennis clinic in New York in 1979. This drew attention to the hereditary aspects of heart disease. His mother already suffered from cardiovascular disease when she died at 27, and his father had already suffered two heart attacks. Examination indicated that one of Ashe's cardiac arteries was completely closed, another had ninety-five percent closed, and a third fifty percent closed in two different places. He underwent quadruple bypass in December of that year. However, a second surgery was necessary in 1983.

In 1988, Ashe was hospitalized after experiencing paralysis in his right arm. After exploratory brain surgery, it was discovered that Ashe was suffering from toxoplasmosis. Subsequent tests revealed him to be HIV positive. His doctors believed he contracted the virus from the blood transfusions used during his second heart surgery. He kept his illness secret until 1992, when he went public. He founded the Arthur Ashe Foundation for the Defeat of AIDS, attempting to raise awareness about the virus and advocated safe sex and sex education.

Ashe died in February 1993 of Age-Related Pneumonia in New York. He was 49 years old. His funeral was held in Richmond Virginia, and governor Douglas Wilder allowed his body to lie in state in the executive mansion. More than 5000 people lined up to pay final respects. Ashe had finished his memoir, "Days of Grace" less than a week before his death.

SEPARATE DEVELOPMENT: APARTHEID SOUTH AFRICA

Racial stratification in South Africa was a reality beginning with Dutch settlement there in the late 17th century. However, one of the primary legal precursors of the system were the 1797 extension of the "pass laws" from only slaves to all black Africans. Further, the 1806 Articles of Capitulation, where the English assumed control of the Cape Colony, required the English rulers to respect previous laws of the Boer settlers, as well as exempting the colony from English Common Law in favour of the already-established Dutch Roman Legal system. This prepared the groundwork for South Africa's white minority to continue pursuing policies rooted in "baasskamp" (white supremacy).

The formalized Apartheid (which is Afrikaans for apart-ness) system came into place following the election of the National Party to government in 1948. It can be largely classified into "petty Apartheid," which entailed a segregation of public facilities and social events (not unlike American Jim Crow policies), and "grand Apartheid," which governed formal housing, living, travel, and employment by race.

Petty apartheid began with a series of enactments such as the "Prohibition of Mixed Marriages Act 55 of 1949," which prohibited marriage between White South Africans and people designated of other races. These laws would be expanded in 1950 and 1957 to forbid "unlawful racial intercourse" and "any immoral act" between people of different races. Blacks were forbidden from establishing businesses in "white South Africa" without special permits from the government. Further, restaurants and public accommodations were reserved for Whites only, excepting Black of Coloured employees. Blacks were explicitly forbidden any alcohol excepting a specific, state produced, low-quality beer. Churches were also segregated, but this was not generally enforced by denominations outside of the Dutch Reform tradition. Education was also segregated, with racially-specific Universities established around the nation. Throughout the 1970's and 80's, spending on white education was ten times higher on a per capita basis than spending on education for other groups.

Greater apartheid involved even more extreme segregation of the races, creating the Bantustans, or "Homelands" for various groups of Africans. Beginning around 1958, numerous land reservations were set aside (along with forced resettlement schemes) for Black South Africans. These Homelands would then, eventually, become fully independent nations. Bantustan residents would no longer be citizens of South Africa, but instead of their appointed homeland. Those who worked in white South Africa (which made up some 87% of the nation's total area) would do so as guest migrant workers. This scheme was never fully realized, as no nation outside of South Africa and the other Bantustans ever recognized any of these independent homelands.

Beginning in 1950, all South Africans were formally classified into one of four racial groups: Black, White, Coloured, and Indian. These last two contained numerous sub-classifications. Classification was determined by appearance, known ancestry, and cultural lifestyle, as well as often arbitrary tests of physiognomy. This data was used, beginning in 1960, for targeted removals of 3.5 million Black and certain Coloured groups to segregated areas.

This system, along with the brutal and capricious enforcement methods utilized by the South African government, met with significant opposition both internationally and domestically. It was the target of frequent condemnation in the United Nations and other international bodies. It also led to increasing arms and trade embargos from numerous nations. Internal resistance to the system grew throughout the 1970's and 1980's, leading to crackdowns and protracted violence that left thousands dead and South Africa an international pariah state. Though some reforms were attempted (including allowing Indian and Coloured representation in parliament), these were insufficient to stem bloodshed and calls for change. Negotiations to end Apartheid began in 1987, In 1990, prominent African National Congress leader Nelson Mandela was released from prison. The Apartheid legislation was repealed in 1991, opening the way for democratic, multi-racial elections in 1994.

HIT THEM WHERE IT HURTS SPORTING BAN ON APARTHEID

Throughout the Apartheid period, South African athletes and sporting associations were banned or often otherwise curtailed from participating internationally in various competitions. Historians debate whether the purposes of the boycott were to end segregation in athletics, or to bring about an end to Apartheid altogether. It is also acknowledged that many of these sporting boycotts exercised greater leverage over the Afrikaner elites than some of the trade embargos.

Bans and boycotts on South African athletes varied by the event and the sport's governing body. For example, the 1934 British Empire Games (now Commonwealth Games) had been awarded to Johannesburg, but was moved to London after South Africa's Government insisted the games be racially segregated. However, South Africa was never banned from the games. Margaret Thatcher's refusal to enforce the Gleneagles agreement, which discouraged sporting links to Apartheid South Africa, led to 32 of the 59 eligible countries withdrawing from the games. These games were a massive financial failure. Citing Apartheid, the International Olympic Committee barred South Africa from competing in the 1964 and 1968 Olympics. It then formally expelled the nation in 1970. In 1976, African nations demanded the suspension of New Zealand from the Olympics, citing their continued sporting contacts. The IOC's refusal led to the majority of African nations to boycott the games that year.

There were also calls for foreign athletes to boycott South African events. When South Africa finally allowed Arthur Ashe a visa to compete in the South African Open of 1973, there were calls from both Americans and South Africans for him not to compete. The South African team won the 1974 Davis Cup when their opponents in the final, India, refused to travel to South Africa to compete. Some South African elite athletes would seek naturalisation or permanent resident status in other nations in order to be able to compete.

Sporting relations with South Africa were rapidly normalised following the ending of Apartheid.

SYNOPSIS

The action of Ashe in Johannesburg centers around Ashe's 1973 trip to the South African Open, the product of many years lobbying on his part. Ashe arrives to decidedly mixed reactions. Though many Black South Africans are excited that he is competing, others have encouraged him to not help legitimize the Apartheid regime with his presence. In his hotel room, he meets with Amahle, a local activist, who points out that due to the complex nature of life in South Africa, his presence may not be the barrier-breaking exercise that he thinks it is. This is further underlined later that night when prostitutes are brought to his hotel suite in an effort to discredit him.

Althea Gibson at Wimbledon, 1957

The next day, Ashe spars with boxer Bob Foster, also recently allowed in the country to compete. The two discuss the reasons they have come to South Africa, as well as the reasons that they have been let in in the first place. Ashe, while later practicing tennis, Ashe's mind wanders and he imagines a training match with Althea Gibson, the first Black athlete to cross the colour barrier in tennis and win a Grand Slam title. She calls him to account for his attitudes toward women's tennis, as well as enlightening him to the challenges faced by the intersectional prejudices against Black women. During this conversation, Ashe remembers a conversation with pan-African scholar and activist Ron Karenga (the founder of Kwanzaa). Althea reminds his to retain his focus.

The next day, Ashe meets secretly with the Black journalist to discuss his upcoming match and the significance that it may have. Conversation with this journalist reveals further the difficulties of living under Apartheid, particularly the limited mobility afforded by the work pass system. Ashe also passes on a banned book that he had smuggled into the country, but is seen by white officials, who proceed to beat the journalist.

Following this, Ashe, Bob, and Frank attempt to fly out to one of the Bantustan "homelands" to meet with a Chief. However, a severe sandstorm requires them to turn back. Bob and Ashe have a falling out, and Ashe and Frank's relationship is strained. Frank then reveals he agreed to a luncheon for Ashe and Afrikaaner elites at Stellenbosch University. Ashe goes, only to face a substantial struggle.

At the luncheon, Ashe squares off with Christoph Hanekom, an anthropology professor at the University and proponent of Apartheid policies, "for the good of all people." Throughout their conversation, punctuated by advertisements for Stellenbosch wines and tourism, Ashe forces Hanekom to admit to fundamental flaws in the Apartheid system. The play ends with Ashe departing Africa and seeing the spectre of Billie Jean King as she prepares to face Bobby Riggs.
