EUROPEAN MIGRANT CRISIS

Though written in 2007, The Container resonates strongly with the topic of the ongoing European Migrant Crisis\(^1\) (aka The Refugee Crisis\(^2\)) which began in 2014/2015 and continues to this day.\(^3\) It is marked by a massive influx of refugees and other migrants coming to Europe by water over the Mediterranean Sea, or overland through Southeast Europe and Turkey. This influx of immigrants (an umbrella term for asylum seekers, refugees, economic migrants, and others) has encountered resistance in many European countries and helped feed populist resentment in some of them.\(^4\)

Numerous elements have contributed to the expanded influx of immigrants to Europe, including poverty, violence, civil war, and hardship linked to human-driven climate change.\(^5\) Of these, refugees fleeing violence and war make up the largest demographic, of those arriving in Europe, more than 50% come from three countries: Syria, Iraq, & Afghanistan.\(^6\) Syria, Afghanistan, & South Sudan make up some 55% of all refugees worldwide. In worldwide terms, Europe hosts roughly 17% of displaced people. Rates of arrival by sea and land have declined since a peak in 2015, but the situation remains ongoing.

Alongside refugees, economic migrations has also been a major factor in the crisis. As opposed to fleeing oppression or violence at home, economic migrants seek better living conditions and job opportunities that may not exist in their country of origin. Those seeking a better life have accounted, over the past 10 years, for 70% of the increase in Europe's workforce, filling crucial gaps in the labor market. The Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development has declared that such immigrants have not provided noticeable disruption to any country's gross domestic product.

According to sources such as The Guardian and La Stampa, a small number of migrants have been agents of terrorist organizations such as the Islamic State. In 2016 and 2017, two major plans by the Islamic State were foiled by The European Police Organization (Europol). Such numbers have been miniscule, however, and general consensus that alarmism over migrants as a terrorist threat is largely a tactic used to foment outrage by nationalist or populist politicians.

Though the peak of the crisis has passed, it is not over. In recent years, countries of origin have begun to shift, with larger numbers coming from Sub-Saharan Africa and the Sahel region. Michael Møller, of the United Nations Geneva Office, noted particularly that the prevalence of cell phones among young people acts as something of a magnet. In seeing what is happening in other parts of the world, they are drawn to a better life and may not be put off by perilous journeys or harsh living conditions. Quite simply, Europe has become a beacon of a better life and many will try anything to achieve it.

THE ROUTES THEY TOOK
By Rebecca Hodge

When we meet the characters at the beginning of The Container, they have all already been on long journeys in search of a safe and steady life. The map below from Reuters demonstrates the most common routes migrants take to get into Europe, with the numbered stars demonstrating important places specific to The Container.

1. Somalia, origin of Fatima and Asha.
2. Afghanistan, origin of Ahmad and Mariam. It is so far away it is not even on this map, located east of Iran.
3. Southeast Turkey, origin of Jemal.
4. The northern border of Italy with France, where the beginning of The Container is located.
5. Southern United Kingdom, particularly London, where the characters are hoping to complete their journey.
SOMALI CIVIL WAR

The Somali Civil War, which some of the characters in The Container are fleeing, is a series of armed conflicts and instability that has persisted in the Horn of Africa from 1991 to the Present. In 1991, the military government of Siad Barre was overthrown by armed opposition, leaving power vacuum.

In order to address the disorder and fighting, United Nations Peacekeeping forces entered the nation and Somalia was rated as a "failed state." Peacekeeping forces would remain until 1995, when they would withdraw having incurred heavy casualties but without establishing central authority. The withdrawal of the United Nations and lack of central authority allowed the local establishment of customary and religious law in a hodgepodge throughout the nation. This meant government by tribal law in some villages, while others were subject to Islamic Sharia, and still others had managed a modicum of civil governance in some regions.

In 2000, a transitional government was established, and in 2006 Ethiopian troops seized most of southern Somalia from the Islamic Courts Union. With the loss of territory, the ICU shattered into numerous radical Islamic movements, including notably, the Al-Qaeda aligned Al-Shabaab. Al-Shabaab has been fighting both the Somali government and African Union Peacekeeping forces for control of the country. Though they have been driven from the cities, the radical Islamists control large swathes of rural territory through the nation. Central authority was finally reestablished in 2012. However, the Federal Government of Somalia still does not exercise control over the full country. International stakeholders have labelled it a "fragile state."

KURDS IN TURKEY

The Kurds, an Iranian people from Western Asia, have a long history of oppression and victimization at the hands of the Turkish government. An ethnic minority, Kurds compose somewhere between 15% and 20% of the overall Turkish population, primarily concentrated in the Southeast of the country. This region is generally viewed by Kurds as "Turkish Kurdistan," though this is not an official designation recognized by the Republic of Turkey.

Since the establishment of the Republic in 1923, discrimination against Kurds has been common alongside periodic massacres and other official oppressions. The terms "Kurd" and "Kurdish" were suppressed in favor of the term "Mountain Turks" until 1991, and the Kurdish language is largely forbidden as a language of instruction in Turkish schools.

This systemic oppression is accompanied by periodic state violence. During the Dersim rebellion, a Kurdish response to the 1934 Law on Resettlement, the province of Dersim was largely depopulated via the killing of 13,160 and exiling of 11,818 civilians by the Turkish Army. In 1930, 15,000 people were killed in the Zilan area in response to the Ararat rebellion. Human rights abuses have continued, with the European Court of Human Rights issuing thousands of condemnations against Turkish actions since early 1970. The latest of which concerns the 2014 mass execution of villagers.

SYNOPSIS

The Container is about five desperate people trying to reach the United Kingdom in a shipping container. Two flee poverty and violence in Somalia, two flee religious extremism in Afghanistan. One seeks a better life away from official oppression and discrimination in Turkey. They have gambled everything, and already come far, in their quest for a better life. However, they cannot know what lies for wait in them ahead.

Xinmeng (Sarah) Sun graduated from William Peace University in May of 2019 and majored Art Administration. In my free time, I really love to watch music or theater productions. I had been working with Wild Party, Five Women’s Wearing the Same Dress, Assistant, Beauty and Beast and Speech and Debate. I mostly work with props, and headset. I do enjoy backstage work not only I get to know the theater better, because every show needs those crew people to make sure the whole show runs smoothly. In the future, I am hoping to work at a theater or a museum, and one of the interested are for me is company manager, because this position get you to travel around places and take care of the whole group.
